Olympic Berry is the real quality berry that both growers and consuming public have been waiting for.

Plants should be set eight feet by eight feet, giving approximately 680 plants per acre.

The Olympic Berry is one of the outstanding achievements in newer horticultural developments. It was originated and developed on the farm of Peter Enckeson on Ashcroft Island, Puget Sound. It is a cross between Dutch Farmer Blackcap raspberry and DeBart's Phenomenal berry.

Several years of experimental work, growing and testing have been conducted to thoroughly prove the merits of this fine berry before any plants of Olympic Berry were released to the public.

Facts about the Olympic Berry

Olympic Berry has proved a regular, dependable cropper.

Olympic Berry is a heavy cropper—test plantings which were not on bottom land produced 12,000 pounds per acre.

Olympic Berry is hardy—it has withstood the most severe winters in the Puget Sound country without injury and produced heavy crops following severe freezing weather.

Olympic Berry is one of the outstanding new developments in the horticultural world. A United States plant patent is pending covering this variety. Olympic Berry has quality. The berries are very large, often two inches long, and "stand up" in shipment. This fruit has been shipped fresh to St. Paul and Minneapolis—arriving in excellent condition.

Olympic Berry has a flavor all its own. No berry approaches it for pies, jams, jelly, canning and freezing—and for juice. The flavor is exquisite—the berries do not break up in the can. It is delicious when eaten fresh and requires little sugar. A limited number of Olympic Berry plants are available this year.
